

There is an ever-increasing number of consumer devices able to identify heart rhythm abnormalities, including atrial fibrillation. In this presentation we will review the potential benefits and pitfalls of incorporating these devices into clinical practice, with an emphasis on screening programs.